John Driscoll is an experienced freelance health professional facilitator and change agent supporting work based learning activities and practice development initiatives. These have included reflective practice projects, clinical supervision training and project management with a range of health related professions both in the UK and Australia. In addition, he retains an academic portfolio having held several HE lecturing posts. He has recently authored two Distance Learning modules contributing to a BSc (Nursing) and manages the Clinical Supervision and Reflective Practice modules accredited by ICS / Edinburgh Napier University. He also has an accompanying resource website www.supervisionandcoaching.com John has published numerous articles and two books promoting a reflective approach to the practice of clinical supervision and runs writing workshops supporting new nurse authors who wish to become published. He is an Editorial Board member for the International Practice Development Journal (online) supported by FoNS (Foundation of Nursing Studies), where he acts as an Associate Consultant. He is also an International Adviser for the International Journal of Orthopaedic and Trauma Nursing and Nurse Education in Practice.

The butterfly represents a powerful metaphor for change and transformation, knowing exactly when to leave the comfort and confinement of its cocoon and fly into the world. People are often not so certain, preferring to remain within the safety of their comfort zones, or preferred ways of working and can fail to even notice, let alone reach their full potential, either personally or professionally. The drive towards the modernisation of business and public services means not only supporting the effective delivery of those services, but enabling individuals and their organisations to manage such transformations and move outside often preferred ways of working.

John Driscoll offers specialist and bespoke healthcare consulting in the following areas;

- ✓ strategic and (or) local development of multi-professional professional (clinical) supervision schemes in practice
- ✓ external group facilitation and appreciative support strategies for managing change in practice
- ✓ development of reflective and action learning in and for clinical practice
- ✓ management and leadership development in practice
- ✓ professional writing for publication workshops and coaching
- ✓ enhancing communication skills in practice
- ✓ external support for practice development including the development of facilitation skills
- ✓ individual life or professional development coaching and including group coaching
